LIVES OF THE FELONS

No. 1.

ROBERT SUTTON, ALIAS "BOB THE WHEELER."

The criminal records of no country perhaps present in the compass of an individwal career so much of painful and amazing interest as attach to the first era of this notorious felon's life; and were his exploits and their results not substantiated by irrefragable proofs still fresh in the minds of many of our citizens, they would be discarded by even the most susceptible imaginations and condemned as the merest vagaries of fiction.

That our readers may the sooner be able to judge of this fact for themselves, we will without further preface commence with the actual events of his career.

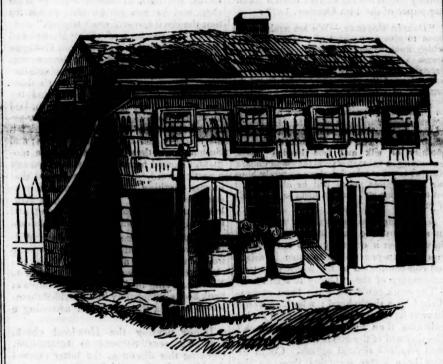

Robert Sutton was born, as near as we can learn, in a village near the city of London, early enough in the last century to make him at present from fifty-five to sixty years of age. He was at the proper time of life apprenticed out to a wheelwright, but possessing a remarkably muscular frame and an extraordinary degree of physical strength and prowess, he allowed himself at an early age to be persuaded to abandon his handicraft, and cast his stalwart fortune in the circle of the prize ring.

It is not for us to describe the history of his pugilistic career. Suffice it that he justified the presage of his renown, and in a number of severe pitched fights, duly chronicled in "Boxiana," came off a creditable combatant and a conqueror. As a member of the fancy, Bob the Wheeler, (so nicknamed from his trade,) soon became acquainted with a number of the admiring swell mob, and from a boon companion of these genii, was easily moulded into a susceptible disciple. How far he progressed in their science or mingled in their practices on the other side of the water, there is no reliable account to say, but it is a fact, that in his twenty-fifth year he found London too hot to hold him, and deemed it more than advisable to seek an asylum in some foreign country. Having been brought to this state of mind, it is not strange to find that, like so many others of his class, he gave this land of the largest liberty his decided preference.

He arrived here somewhere in the immediate neighborhood of 1820, and after working at his trade a short time, set up an English beer-shop in Rosevelt street. This establishment he called the "Darby & Joan," and had its title properly certified by an illustration of that domestic couple on a sign before the door. It was situated nearly opposite a large livery stable, on the left hand side of the first block from Chatham street. The building, a small blue frame house, is still standing, and is known as number 24. This concern soon became the resort of all the most notorious English thieves and burglars in the city, and the pugilistic fame of Bob the Wheeler also drew together admiring crowds of the bellicose youngsters of the town.

Sparring exhibitions were given there; it was the place where all sporting mat-discussed; and the respective qualities and | tion was bound to eventuate in the most merits of "shoulder hitters" and "artful dodgers" weighed and waged with the precision of philosophy. By encouraging this spirit, the landlord was reaping a very cheering harvest, and whenever the fever flagged, he revived it by throwing himself into the field for a match, for the purpose of keeping up the profitable excitement. This went on very prosperously for four or five years, during which time, not satisfied with the large profits of a legitimate business, he occasionally amused himself with picking a pocket; but was obliged to abandon this line, in consequence of having been arrested in 1824 for a very clumsy attempt of the kind. Immediately after this, he formed a secret connection with three other rogues, who, for desperation, cunning, and capacity, have never been exceeded. The first of these was James Holdgate, an English pewterer or maker of fancy leaden toys, who, at the above date, had but recently arrived in this country. This man was employed by the Gas Company to repair the fixtures and metres of the various stores, and was therefore pitched upon by Sutton as a capital hand to learn all the secrets of the warehouses his vocation gave him access to, and also to get an impression of their keys. He therefore corrupted him to his purpose, and the result was several successful burglaries in rapid succession. At this period, a gentleman named "Moccasin" Jackson, deceived in the character of Holdgate, furnished him with $1000, to start him in the pewterer's business; and in accordance with the offer, the gas-man established a shop at No. 3 Murray street, in the small two-story brick house which stood so many years in the rear of Tenney's (then Brewster's) jewelry store, on the corner of that street and Broadway.

The next member of the coalition was an Englishman of remarkable abilities and liberal education, named James Stevens, or checks that they might find therein .and a New Yorker named John Reed, who was also a man of superior acuteness and address, was the fourth. This party fully they intended as their prey, and by offerappreciated each other's abilities and felt ing them a note of large amount induce ters from rat-catching to cock-fighting were a substantial confidence that their connec- them to give a check in change. This was picking them out of the water. All striking results.

This organization was effected, so far as the three first were concerned, as early as the fall of 1824, but though they doubtless safely effected many depredations in the two years immediately succeeding their aefarious companionship, we cannot fix the strong presumption of any particular offence upon them until 1826, when a daring attempt was made to enter Brewster's jewelry store by undermining it through the cellar. The robbers however, not being able to accomplish their purpose in a single night, had the progress of their operations discovered on the following day, and their designe of course defeated; but Holdgate, the honest and thriving pewterer next door, was never once suspected. He however shortly after moved away, and took up his residence in James street, near his old friend and pitcher, Bob the Wheeler.

About this time, Reed, who was a man of superior genius, began to exercise a controlling influence in the band, and proposed to change their system of downright burglaries, (the predominant policy of Bob the Wheeler,) to a more powerful and insinuating system of acquisition. This was forgery. He possessed acids which were capable of extracting from paper any name or figure, and his skill as a penman ena bled him to counterfeit any name or sign with the most remarkable exactness.

His counsel prevailed, and the knavish cunning of the quartette set itself to work to invent modes of obtaining the desired signatures. Holdgate was entitled to the credit of suggesting the successful plan to effect this object; and Sutton, following his peculiar bent of mind, which was force, proposed that when address should fail, they should extend their operations by burglariously entering the stores of those merchants whose signatures they desired to obtain, and gather them from the papers Holdgate's design was to make inconsiderable purchases of goods from those whom been paid, and it was cashed without d mur. From this time we hear no more o Shouler, and his name vanishes from the records altogether. The probability is, that he was some poor journeyman knuck, who was tossed this job by way of keeping him from starvation.

A forgery on Abraham Le Foy, for $760 on the North River Bank, another on James Grant, a tin worker, and several others, followed, which we will omit to enumerate, for the purpose of coming at the grand exploit of all.

It had long been the desire of the party to obtain the signature of the heavy firm of Howland & Aspinwall in Front street but all their attempts had failed. At length Bob Sutton's policy prevailed, and they determined to effect their primary object by a burglary. They therefore went together to that store on the evening of the 28th September, 1827, and at a little before nine o'clock, while all the clerks were busy in the counting room above, and while wayfarers were passing up and down the street, Reed, with unparalleled audacity, advanced from the pier where the other three lay secretly in wait, and with a bunch of keys commenced the process of fitting one to the lock. After trying several, he at length succeeded in getting one that turned the bolt, but this was only effected at the expense of severely straining the lock. He then returned to his associates, and Sutton and Holdgate went away with him, leaving Stevens to watch the effect which the discovery of the injury would have upon the inmates of the store. About ten o'clock the last clerk attempted to fasten up, but finding after several attempts some unexpected obstruction in the lock, he left off in despair, and walked up and down, as if meditating what to do-This lasted for an hour, and Stevens getting tired, and seeing no prospect of getting the work through that night, moved off to the "Darby & Joan," where, after a general consultation. Sutton was deputed it go down the next morning, and to accertain what effect the circumstance had produ these were the cancelled checks of a Mr. J. Osborn. In the course of the 29th, Reed filed down and refushioned the key, and on the evening of that day, the whole quartette again started upon the expedition. They arrived before the store at a little before nine o'clock, and Reed, as before, advanced and tried the key. This time it turned as glib as oil, and he retired among the rest, to wait the departure of the occupants. At nine, a carriage came for Howland, and he drove away, and at ten, the last clerk locked up and departed. It was then determined by the band, that the business should be done that night, and they returned to the "Darby & Joan," to equip themselves for the enterprize. Disguises, a small crow, a brace and bitts, a dark lantern, picks and skeletons for inner doors, and a variety of other articles of the burglar's kit, were prepared, and fully equipped, the conspirators started down Rosevelt street to the water. On arriving at the river they broke loose a boat by snapping her chain, and dropped down by the stream, opposite the store.

At midnight the whole party entered, and closing the door securely after them, rummaged the store till nearly day-break, securing in their search a variety of mer-cantile papers and several checks. Reed took the key of the iron safe in the wall and pocketed it, and he also took some and pocketed it, and he also took some silk handkerchiefs, a box of cigars, and a pair of pantaloons belonging to one of the clerks. Having got through, they abandoned the place, and separated to meet again at the "Darby & Joan" at night.

When the villains got together in their den on the evening after the burglary, a conversation was held as to the best man-conversation was held as to the best manner of disposing of the articles obtained. After considerable debate, the conflicting opinions softened down into a general decision, that all, except a few of the most important papers, should be consigned to the flames. The grate which glowed before them received these dangerous telltales of their guilt, and only four of the checks were reserved for the purposes of They owed this special preservation entirely to the fact of their only being crossed or cancelled with ink, was to extract all the useless ink by the separated, after indulging in a friendly drink all round to the future success of their schemes.

Among the cancelled checks was one for $7,760 on the Union Bank, signed "G. G. & S. Howland;" another on the Bank of America, signed by "J. Osborn," which was filled in for $4,900; another for $3,500 on the Merchants' Bank, signed by Wm. H. Aspinwall. These were duly renovated in a little time by the skilful workman, and one of them, which had its signature accidentally destroyed by a careless application of the obliterating fluid, was at once replaced by an inimitable counterfeit.

Having proceeded thus far, it was de-cided that the dates of all should be left blank until a day should be agreed upon for their general presentation, and this was for a while deferred, in the hope of getting more signatures for other checks. The result of this postponement was the obtaining a check from Abram Lefoy, in change for a time of the burglary, and yet the final scheme remained unconsummated. While remaining thus apparently in indecision, a new design was broached, and though none of the events which subsequently transpired leave trace of any hand but Stevens', there can be no doubt that the risks and profits of the enterprize were duly shared by all of his above accomplices.

The story can be best and most briefly told by the following extract from a morning paper of the 14th October, 1827:

"DARING ROBBERY .- We are again called upon to give an account of a daring robbery, which, from the method of its accomplishment, seems to connect itself with a series of similar depredations that have of late, from time to time, alarmed the community and defeated the sagacity of our energetic police. Sometime during the course of yesterday (Sunday) afternoon, while its proprietors were at church, the extensive warehouse of F. & H. Sheldon & Co., in Pearl street, was entered by some villains by the back way, and robbed of a large quantity of silk and lace French goods. quantity of silk and lace French goods, amounting in value to several thousand dollars. No clue is yet obtained, but we sincerely hope our indefatigable police will be able to ferret out the villains and consign them to the hands

As we remarked before, this was subsejuently proved to have been the work of Stevens, but it certainly does not require superhuman penetration to trace its origin and consummation to the whole secret representation of the "Darby & Joan."

The work could not have been accomplished by a single hand; who then would Stevens have more naturally sought for his assistants than his sworn confederates? The disposal of the goods must necessarily have required several agents. Could he have been better seconded than by the prompt and ready aid of these intimate

The inevitable conclusion therefore is, that this, like the former, was a joint exploit, though peculiar considerations on the part of Stevens, which will be revealed hereafter, prevented its various features from accurate disclosure. The accomplishment of this latter depredation precipitated the original scheme, and the Tuesday following (October 15th,) was set apart for its final consummation. The preceding evening found all the rogues together in secret conclave, in Sutton's private apartments. The shutters were carefully closed, the doors locked, and every crevice and keyhole stopped that might convey a sound. Then, gathering round a table in the centre of the room, the vil-lanous quartette debated in a cautious whisper on the arrangements to be adopted on the following day. Before them lay the fraudulent devices. Stevens was en-gaged in filling in the dates, and as they came in turn from the hands of the masterforger, they were anxiously examined by each member of the group. The checks being completed, it became necessary to decide who should take the bold responsibility of their presentation. This gave rise to considerable controversy, as each was desirous of shifting so dangerous an ordeal from himself. At length, however, an arrangement was made that inspired general satisfaction. It was agreed that Holdgate, assisted by Stevens, should preinstead of being cut like those condemned to be destroyed. The above four were sent Aspinwall's check, as well as the large one on the Union Bank; and that Sutton and Read should effect the collection of and Reed should effect the collection of operation of the subtle and penetrating acids which he always carried in his possession. The council being over, and its to make and precautions to be taken, to deliberations thus concluded, the rogues guard against eventual detection. In pursuance of these, Holdgate went to his own house and stealthily withdrew a plain dark suit of clothes and black fur hat, and deposited them at Sutton's for the service of the following day.

At ten o'clock on the morning of the 15th October, the time appointed for the rendezvous, Holdgate was sweating over the fires in his pewterer's shop in James street, surrounded by his industrious apprentices, and looking, while apparently profoundly bent upon his honest labor, like anything but the daring swindler who was on the brink of a damning and audacious crime. Of a sudden he threw down his tools, and, wiping with his sleeve the perspiration that was streaming down his brow. remarked, with a loud voice, that " he believed he would step around to the ' Darby' for a moment and get a drop of ale."

The rest of the swindlers were already at the rendezvous, anxiously awaiting the arrival of the Pewterer.

Several days had now elapsed from the || has failed, or that he hopes to cast his share | upon my shoulders by this delay! If I thought so, I'd"—

"Has the gig been ordered?" inquired

Reed, interrupting his brother forger.
"Yes," replied Sutton, though the question was not directed to him, "it has been waiting for him these ten minutes. I had it sent round to Pearl street, to avoid the observation of our neighbors, and all he has got to do is to jump into it, drive to the banks, get back in fifteen minutes to his shop, and he has got an alibi in his fist that the devil himself can't trip up."

Just as the host of the "Darby and Joan" concluded this expression, Holdgate came hastily in, and his entrance was greeted by a long-drawn breath of satisfaction. In an instant his pewterer's dress. was discarded, piece by piece, and the simple and more gentlemanly garb, laid by on the previous night, was hastily assumed in its stend. Being dressed, he left the "Darby and Joan" with Stevens; and Sutton, after they had been gone a moment, followed round to Pearl street to say a parting word. It was there agreed that in case anything should go wrong, a rendezvous had better be appointed, at Nib-lo's Bank Coffee House in Pine street, and then all started on their several expeditions.

Stopping at the corner of Pine and William streets, Stevens and Holdgate sprang from the vehicle, and, leaving it in the charge of a boy, walked briskly down to Wall, carrying in their hands a couple of bank books, which they had provided themselves with for the purpose of assuming a business air.

Before offering the Howland check, Holdgate sent Stevens to reconnoitre. Obeying this direction, the latter entered the Union Bank, and observing a gentleman writing near the window, asked him if he were filling up "Bills on London?" Conceiving this to be an impertinent ques-tion, the clerk sharply answered "No!" and turning on his heel at this rebuff, the swindler left the bank and returned to Pine street, giving a signal to his confederate as he passed by him, that "all was right." Holdgate then entered boldly with a bank book in his band, and bustling up to the desk with a business air, offered the check to the scrutiny of the paying teller. The treacherous missive cost but a single glance from the officer of the hank, and then was cashed without demur. Its proceeds were a $5000 post note, two $1000's, and a $50 and a $10. These were handed to Stevens, and he was directed to run into the Bank Coffee House and get the "Aspinwall" check for $3,500 from Reed. This arrangement had been made to prevent more than one check being found upon the person in case of an arrest. Stevens found Reed cosily seated by the counter, with a cup of coffee in one hand and a huge pie in the other, apparently devoted to no other object in life than the alternate destruction of As the former approached him, Reed, without stopping to set down either the one or the other, stretched his head forward and said "You will find what you want in my hat." Stevens took it off, and having obtained the desired article, re-placed the custor, and left the bar-room as Reed, with his mouth full, told him he "would soon see him down at his place."

Stevens and Holdgate then went into the Merchants' Bank together, and the latter presented the check. The teller took the paper in his hand, looked at it for a moment, and laid it down. Then scrutinizing the offerer sharply, he looked at the again, but a commenced telling down the money. The forgers drew a long but subdued breath at this apparent escape. They, however, reckoned their game too Suddenly the teller seemed struck with an idea. He paused in his task, and, with the uncounted bunch of notes in his fist, moved off towards one of the bookkeepers in a distant part of the room, and made him a communication. The forgers turned upon each other a corresponding glance of fear, and looked towards the door.

The trepidation was but momentary, however, and, unflinching as a rock, the imperturbable Pewterer calmly awaited the result. The bookkeeper hinted to the teller that something might be wrong, but seeing the man remaining so tranquilly at the counter, the suspicions of both were completely lulled. Two or three books were searched through, and the teller hav-ing satisfied himself that there were no funds in the bank to the credit of Mr. Aspinwall, and ascribing the whole circumstance to a mistake of the drawer, went back to the counter and informed the man

"Not good!" exclaimed Holdgate, with considerable surprise, and with his accom-plice, hurriedly left the bank. He then sprang into the gig, drove rapidly up town, resumed his pewterer's dress at the "Darby & Joan," and in twenty minutes after his departure from his workshop, was back again among his apprentices.

In the mean time Stevens had exchanged the $5000 no'e at the U. S. Branch Bank, Sutton had čashed the "Osborn" check for $4,900, at the Bank of America, and Reed, though it does not appear that he presented it himself, effected the collection of Lefoy's for $700 on the North River Bank, and immediately afterward changed it at the Fulton.

Thus far all had gone smoothly on, and the successful rogues congregated again shortly after mid-day at the den in Rosevelt street. The enterprize, however, was not yet quite complete. A large portion of the money still remained unchanged, and the business of smashing it was consigned to Stevens and Holdgate conjointly. The latter first proceeded to the Franklin Bank and offered the $500 note on the Union. The paying teller turning to the cashier, asked him if he should change it, and on receiving a reply in the affirmative, granted the request of his nefarious customer. Holdgate then crossed over to the Chemical Bank and changed $1,500 more.

Following directly in his track, Stevens entered the Franklin Bank at or near half past two, and as he was proceeding to the desk to accomplish his purpose, the teller of the Union Bank came hastily in and inquired if any one had offered a $5.000 post note there for change. On being answered in the negative, he directed that if such a bill were offered, the party presenting it should be arrested on the spot. He then went out muttering that " if people would scatter their checks carelessly about, the bank should not be the losers by it."

Instead of being deterred and alarmed by this, the genius of Stevens perceived that no opportunity could be more lavora-ble to his purpose. Deciding in an instant, he therefore stepped boldly up to the desk, and, as he pulled out his money, asked what all that conversation had been about.

"Oh, some forgery, I suppose," said the teller carelessly, as he received fifteen hundred dollars from the forger's hands.

The notes, which were the proceeds of Osborn's check on the Bank of America, were then changed into bills of smaller denominations on the Franklin, and, congratulating himself on his boldness and success, the swindler left the bank.

Thus was completed, from first to last, one of the most artful, profound and skilful depredations that perhaps ever was committed: a depredation evincing in its various stages a combination of deep and calculating foresight—a prompt, penetrating and accurate sagacity, added to a degree of cool and audacious intrepidity, that excites our mingled amazement, horror, and

Released from the intense anxieties of the previous fortnight, the gratified rogues, after dividing their spoil, celebrated their good fortune in an evening debauch at the "Darby and Joan," amusing themselves occasionally with a humorous but smothered rehearsal of the little incidents which were attached to the several stages of their dramatic crime.

Having now reaped the harvest of their ingenuity and persevering efforts, it became necessary for the rogues to neglect no measure that might conduce to guard inst suspicion or detection. In of this consideration, Stevens and Reed resolved to leave the city, and on the second day after their great exploit they accordingly departed for Boston and Philadelphia respectively; the former taking with him to the first mentioned place, among his other plunder, the register of the schooner "Edgar," which had been obtained from Howland's store and saved on account of the numerous signatures it contained; and Stevens, carrying with him to the Quaker city a few of the important Howland papers, which had been preserved for similar reasons, as well as a considerable amount of the less bulky valuables of the Messrs. Sheldon's.

The host of the "Darby and Joan" and the Pewterer were by no means sorry at this decision. Both Reed and Stevens, being in no business, lived a suspicious sort of life, and Reed, from previous arrests, was already well known to the police. Their company was, therefore, dangerous in itself, and might be made doubly so from an act of casual imprudence.

The arrangements suited all alike. It gratifying their natural propensity for extravagance and luxury without danger, while it enabled the Pewterer and the Pugilist to smothe: their crimes without dread of implication through the acts of others.

Having now obtained a breathing spell from the direct routine of our history, we may here devote ourselves to the slight examination of the earlier histories of Reed and Stevens, before plunging again into the mass of detail which follows in the train of the above offence.

We avoided doing this at first, that we might not confuse the course of our rela-

CHAPTER II.

Reed, the only American engaged in the above confederacy, had long been what is technically called, in the flash slang of thieves, a "a crossman," and in the course of his career had become thoroughly known to the police. He was by trade a tailor, and was the son of an industrious grocer of George's (now Market) street, of this city. The first recorded trace of his criminal operations was the commission of a grand larceny in 1816, for which he was arrested by Jacob Hays, and on conviction of which he was duly sentenced to the State's Prison for five years. Having served his time out, he was discharged in 1821, and was shortly afterwards arrested by the same officer for pilfering at a fire. The punishment for this offence he, however, fortunately escaped, by the non-appearance of any owners for the stolen goods found upon his person; and immediately upon his release he improved his liberty by fleeing from a city whose untir-ing police tracked him at every turn. He accordingly shaped his course to Pittsburg, and from thence to New Brunswick; and shortly after his arrival at the latter place, committed a forgery on the New Brunswick Bank, and was sentenced to the prison of that State for a term of five years. A few days after his incarceration, he managed to break prison and escape, and by the kindness of an outside friend, who supplied him with a change of clothes, he managed to secure an immediate retreat to Philadelphia. He had been there but a few weeks, when, in connection with his new pal, he committed a forgery on the Bank of North America, for which he was tried before the Mayor's court of that city, and sentenced for three years. He proved to be a refractory prisoner, and at the expiration of the term of his sentence, was detained some weeks over his time for threatening two of the keepers. During the period of this latter detention, Mr. Hays informed the authorities in charge of the establishment, of Reed's previous escape from the prison at New Brunswick, and told them that he was wanted at the latter place for the remainder of his punishment. He was told, however, in reward for his trouble, that "they did not know any thing about it," and immediately afterwards the convict was discharged at the intercession of the keepers before mentioned, and on the express condition that he should never again pollute that town with his presence; "a promise which," remarks the Philadelphia United States Gazette, of March, 1828, (in an account of his subsequent offences,) "he has most faithfully kept." From Philadelphia, Reed returned to New York, the scene of his earlier transgressions, relying upon the length of his absence and his altered appearance to evade the recognition of the police. Here he fell in with Stevens, who had about a year before arrived in the country, from the West Indies, and who, attracted by Reed's great reputation among "crossmen." at once sought his acquain-tance. We shall here postpone for a few lines an account of the results of this brilliant connection, to sketch the previous career of Stevens to the latter period, and then we shall run smoothly along with the cotemporaneous histories of all.

Stevens, as we said before, was an Englishman, and a man of fine talents, ele gant appearance, liberal education, and accomplished manners.* At the time we speak of, he was a man of somethirty years of age. What his early career in his native country had been we have no accurate means of ascertaining, but we hear of his figuring to considerable advantage, as early as 1820, in St. Bartholomew's and St. Thomas', in the West Indies. In the former place, as in the latter, he represented himself as a wealthy gentleman of leisure, and was unhesitatingly admitted to the best al advantage from this intercourse in St. Bartholomew's, by a forgery of some extent, and at St. Thomas' he succeeded in swindling a wealthy lady, whom he had fascinated by his personal attractions, of a considerable sum of money. For this ex-ploit, however, he was obliged to decamp, in consequence of an anticipated exposure from a gentleman who recognized him as the adventurer of St. Barts.

From St. Thomas', Stevens departed abruptly to Havana, and on his arrival at that place decided upon altering his "chant" (name) to that of Henry T. Erskine, Esq., representing himself as the eldest son and heir presumptive to Lord Erskine. Borne out by his abilities, and recommending himself by the remarkable fascination of his manners, the noble young Englishman soon became the lion of the place, and the dark-eyed beauties of the Palace Square and the Paséo flashed upon him their most encouraging and admiring glances.

For a season his star reigned in the ascendant, but having extended his operations to an extravagant degree, his position began to be unsteady, and he was fain to make arrangements for a change of residence again.

During this decisive winter campaign, Stevens had formed an acquaintance (of what particular nature it does not appear) with two young brothers of the name of Hart; and they, like himself, were at the above-mentioned time actuated by some equally stringent motive for a secret and speedy departure. They all three accordingly made their preparations, and avoiding the sentries on the Mole, got off in a schooner bound for New York,-Stevens, as a crowning exploit, obtaining a sum of £500 from an English gentleman on the very day of his exit. Shortly after the arrival of the trio here, the two brothers committed suicide at a boarding house in Nassau street, though what was the cause of the act never was distinctly shown.

Following the natural instinct of a rogue, Stevens soon found out the "Darby & Joan," and there formed the acquaintance and professional connection of which we have spoken, with "Bob the Wheeler" and his protegé, the Pewterer. Together, this trio drove a thriving trade, one of the features of which we have already noticed in the attempted burglary on the rich jew-elry store on the corner of Murray street and Broadway. There were several other crimes, of which the lapse of time has barely lest a trace, and which the absence of recorded particulars renders us unable to include with any satisfactory precision.

The news of Reed's discharge from the Philadelphia State Prison made a profound impression upon the above party. who admired a "family man" (a first class man), with all the -professional ardor of their souls, and each promised to keep a keen look out, in case he should come to the city, to secure his talents, by inducting him as a member of their circle. We have intimated before, that Stevens was the successful man in finding him out, and it is our duty now to record the air of triumphant pride with which that gentleman led him by the hand into the council closet of the "Darby." Reed expressed as much gratification at the flattering reception accorded him by his new associates as they did satisfaction at his acquaintance, and, overflowing with a keen sense of their attentions, he thanked them with a burst of feeling, and pledged himself a thoroughgoing pal to their designs.

His introduction was signalized with an elegant supper, and the dark souls of the quartette mingled their perverted impulses in a natural and involuntary overflow of professional sentiment. "What a piece of work is man!" Debase him as you will, you cannot deprive him of a single attribute! Mark the extreme, and you merely shift the scale. The felon still retains the same pride, the same hopes, the same attachments, the same ambition to excel, and the same dread of sinking in degree, as ever. The classes which he has abandoned may sneer at and contemn, but he will find lesser circles that will reverence and admire. The hatred of mankind may bar him out from general intercourse, but still he has his little outcast world that lets in its measure of Elysium. To the poles of its diameter he is a true man; beyond-a social Ishmael, bearing the mark and curse of Cain.

The philosophy of the whole matter lies in a nut-shell. Though degraded and de-based below the lowest class in the category, thieves nevertheless are men. As rected officer Homan to proceed to James afforded the two latter an opportunity of || circles of society. He reaped a profession-|| such, they are the mere disciples of a peculiar creed, and bear contumely and oppression for opinion's sake as well as the best martyr that ever perished for disputing the color of Mahomet's mule, or the souffing or unspuffing of the communion candles. They have chosen their risk in the great game of life. Gold is the only incentive; liberty their stake; disgrace, the prison, and the scaffold, their hazards.

Stevens and Reed, from the peculiar formation of their minds and bent of their genius, immediately formed a strong personal attachment to each other, and to-gether they accomplished many characteristic exploits without the aid or complicity of their two before named associates. It may be, that the Sheldon robbery lay entirely between them. At any rate, shortly after their connection (two years previous to the commission of the Howland burglary), they robbed the mail between New York and Philadelphia of a large amount of money, among which were ten post notes of the Messrs. Allens, of Wall street, of $500, each of which we are to speak

We have now regularly traced the progressive formation of this arch coalition to the original starting point of our narrative. It might have been more methodical to have begun with these latter abstracts of biography as a preliminary, but we held it to be a duty to the rascal whom we had selected as our hero, to take up the circle of events where they first revolved around his personal exploits.

At the point of the above biographical digression, we left the parties on the day after "passing the soft," on the eve of a voluntary dissolution. Stevens went to Philadelphia, and Reed, mindful of the pledge given on his discharge from the Pennsylvania prison, refused to accompany him, but turned north to Boston. The first trace we find of the former's operations in the Quaker city was the receipt, by Messrs. F. & H. Sheldon & Co., of a letter dated "U. S. Hotel, Philadelphia, October 18th," the writer of which advised them "to spare themselves any further trouble and expense in searching after their goods, as they had already been disposed of, and the money for them obtained."
This admirable specimen of address and impudence was of course anonymous.

On the morning of the 16th of October, the day after the presentation of the checks, the town was in a buse of wonder at the magnitude, extent, and audacity of the fraud, and connecting the forgeries at once with the burglary upon the Howlands' store, the whole city press declared them to be but succeeding links in an extended chain of similar offences.

Merchants were alarmed, safes were purchased by those who were without, stores with valuable stock had their locks immediately changed, hundreds of private watchmen were engaged as additional security in various quarters of the town, the bank books of all important houses were sent in to every institution to be balanced. and the startled bankers looked in eager apprehension over their accounts, to see if they, like the recent sufferers, had not been made victims of the arch abilities of the same mysterious penditti. Public curiosity was at its height, the police spread like a pulk of Cossacks on a charge, darting in every direction, and the whole town was wondering who the mysterious man in the dark clive colored coat, who had come like an evil spirit and vanished like a vision. could be.

While search and inquiry was going on in all quarters, and the sagacity and penetration of every adult in the county concentrated on surmises as to the offerer of the checks, a gentleman named Timo-THY B. REDMOND, then keeping a large and flourishing establishment street, under the name of the "U.S. Hotel," took part, like all around him, in the prevailing wonderment. Unfortunately for himself, without being aware of it, he bore a likeness to the Pewterer so miraculously exact, that it afterwards, as will be seen. baffled the scrutiny of the most keen observers, and eventuated in one of the most singular and remarkable events of individual misfortune that perhaps ever was recorded as springing from such a cause. Leaving this, however, to its gradual developement, we shall now proceed, without further interruption, with the regular course of events.

Two or three days after Holdgate's rest and discharge, Timothy B. Redmo the hotel keeper before named, put on an olive green dress coat and a shabby fur hat, both of which had long formed a portion of his wardrobe, and started out on some business in Wall street.

As he passed the Union Bank, Daniel Ebbetts, the paying teller, who had cashed the $7,760 check for Holdgate, was standing on the steps of that institution. instant his eye fell upon Redmond, he started. Good fortune had at length revealed the swindler. He thanked his lucky stars, and followed hastily in the steps of the unconscious and unsuspecting publican. On arriving at his hotel, Redmond went in and left the amazed pursuer at the door. The latter soon found out the name of the person whom he had pursued, and bursting with his discovery, flew to communicate his tidings to the police and to claim their aid. His intelligence was eagerly devoured by the theretofore baffled department, but it was necessary to proceed in this case with caution. Redmond was a man of unblemished reputation, and should a mistake be made by any unwise precipitation, all parties concerned might be made to suffer most severely. Homen was charged with the business, and Ebbetts was directed to get Edward A. Nicoll, of the Merchants' Bank, to help identify him. Nicoll was accordingly waited upon by Ebbetts, with the information that he had found the forger of the 15th, and on the 25th October, the two went together to the U. S. Hotel, and there the former pointed Redmond out to him through the glass door which opened from the hall into the bar-room. The instant Nicoll saw Redmond he was struck with the conviction of his being the swindler of the 15th, and substantiating the testimony of the teller of the Union Bank, poor Redmond was arrested on the following day.

It is unnecessary to attempt to describe the effect of this thunderbolt upon the in-nocent accused. The papers spread his name from east to west, and several circumstances, trifling in themselves, were industriously linked together to pile an accumulated infamy upon his head.

Still the authorities were obliged Still the authorities were tread with cautious steps upon the surface of a character till then without a stain, and the examination which was held in the matter resulted in his discharge for the time, in the hope that circumstances, now that suspicion had fallen upon the trail of truth, might reveal facts that would to uncertainty into conviction. No. 2. JAMES SMITH. ALIAS HONEYMAN, ALIAS EDWARDS,

THE CELEBRATED CITY BANK ROBBER.

The subject of the following sketch, now incarcerated in the Tombs on a charge of participation in the robbery of the Poughkeepsie barge Clinton, of $34,000 in April last, is, in common with the most notorious felons who infest our continent, a native of England. The city of London claims the honor of his birth, and the district, or county. of Surrey shares the credit with the metropolisitself. This event, so important to our history, took place in 1795. Our hero is, consequently, fifty years of age. Springing from respectable parents, Smith received the ordinary term of common school education, and at a proper age was apprenticed out to a morocco dresser. Intelligent and industrious, he soon proved an excellent workman; but being disposed to frolic, he soon became the associate of loose and dangerous companions. During the latter part of the period of his apprenticeship, he contracted a rather intimate connection with a young girl, whom, upon obtaining his majority, he married. Disgusted with his laborious occupation, and having acquired settled habits of enjoyment, Smith resolved to change his course of life; and accordingly, with a small sum which he had scraped together by saving and borrowing, set up a public house, or beer-shop, in the vicinity of the Surrey theatre.

His house unfortunately attracted the attention and patronage of the thieves of the quartier, and it soon became the resort of a gang of the most accomplished knaves that infested London. This demoralising association could not fail in communicating its debasing influence upon a disposition so tractable as Smith's, and in a short time an exploit, which, a year or two before would have been regarded with instinctive horror, was only seen in the light of an exciting and alluring enterprise.

From receiving stolen goods, and smashing (changing) stolen money, Smith soon aspired to a more active part; and during a period of two or three years he was the successful participant in a number of skilful robberies. At length one of his designs miscarried, and he was suspected, among others, of a daring burglary. Obliged to avoid pursuit, he judged it to be the most prudent course to put the Atlantic between him and his pursuers, and to try his talents in an unturned field; and, following out this resolution, he landed in New York in

Though the proceeds of his former business profits and the avails of his last successful depredation had made him master of a comfortable sum, Smith chose first to consecrate his character in our hemisphere by dedicating it ostensibly to honorable effort. He accordingly applied for, and obtained, work at his trade from Jonathan Trotter, leather dealer in the Swamp, and at the same time set up a beer-shop, in the name of his wife, on the S. E. corner of Rosevelt and Madison streets.

This establishment did quite a thriving business and soon afforded its owner a pretext for abandoning his laborious daily occupation. Devoting himself to the house, nefarious talent in the city, and numbered in the combination some of those old assos whose successive miscarriages in the old world had obliged to seek securer quarters in the new. Together, these parties devised oblique aggressions upon the property of our citizens, and for a long period of time triumphed in success without suspicion. Smith was peculiarly fortunate in all his expeditions and enterprises, and being the leader of the crowd and master of the rendezvous, amassed the richest harvest. His depredations had begun, however, to excite the attention of our then vigilant police, and in one case he was only saved from detection in the very act of committing a burglary in Brooklyn, by a perilous leap from a second story window. He was arrested for the offence nevertheless, on the following day, but in conse-

it prudent to alter her location, so she accordingly abandoned the neighborhood where her husband had become too famous, and transferred her establishment to the lower part of Nassau street, on the block next above the custom-house.

Being now spotted by the police, and a check put upon his operations, Smith cast about for a scheme which, at a single stroke, might make him rich, and enable him to seek a new meridian, an affluent man. While his brain was thus laboring for a design, the idea suddenly struck him that he might successfully make an en-trance into the City Bank, a brick building then situated upon the site of the present institution, in Wall street. He communicated his design to two accomplices, named Murray and Parkinson, both experienced English thieves, the latter being the same man at present implicated with him in the recent robbery of the Poughkeepsie barge. Smith's suggestions were greedily adopted, and, Parkinson being the least known, was deputed to obtain the impression of the outer lock. This was obtained in a few days, and the craft of Murray fashioned the instrument that was required to seduce

Being thus armed for their exploit, the next object was to effect an entrance. A dark and stormy night favored their project, and Parkinson being placed upon the watch to give a signal when they might securely venture out, the other two knaves approached the door, and after a little effort slipt safely in. An obstacle met them, however, in the first few steps. Another door opposed its barrier to their further progress. Picks and skeletons were tried without avail. No resource was left but to take an impression of this lock, as of the other, and repeat their task. This was done, and another entrance made, but still without effect. They were barred from their object by another door, which obliged them to their previous course. Finally the fastenings of the vaults themselves disappointed them for the last time, and thus, after having made four several entrances, they were again

" Sent bootless home and """ back !"

At length success rewarded their endeavors. The fifth effort was triumphant, and the anxious scout outside, after the lapse of a painful half hour, had the felicity of hearing from his accomplices when they finally emerged from the gloom of the building, that they had been successful. The parties returned to Smith's house, and upon examination found themselves in ession of a sum of $200,000. A partial division took place, and among the share of Parkinson was a parcel of Rutland County Bank notes to the amount of $11,000, which had been a special deposit of the firm of the Messrs. Allen, brokers, with the City Bank for safe keeping, and 360 doubloons, in gold, also a special de-posit, and the whole property of a Spaniard, who, upon learning his total ruin, committed suicide. After the distribution, the parties separated, Murray taking refuge in a private house in James street. Parkin-son leaving for Jersey City, and Smith conveying his trunks the same night to the wharf at the foot of Barclay street. When the night boat from Albany came in, Smith, who was standing on the sidewalk with his baggage, hailed a cartman, and representing himself as having just arrived, desired to be taken to a private boarding house. He was then conveyed to a house in Elm street, near Grand.

On the following day, the town was struck with wonder and astonishment at the audacity of the robbery, and amidst the created, the bank offered a reward of $5,000 for the detection of the thieves. Curiosity increased from day to day, and the mystery, during the canvass of every probability, kept growing deeper and deep er, while the horrible fate of the unfortu nate Spaniard lent to it a shade of horror.

Ten days had elapsed, and still the main perpetrator slept snugly in his new domicile. A danger was brewing about his head, however, of which he little dreamt. His singular habits and conduct had excited the curiosity of the servant girl, and her mind was seriously occupied with keen conjectures as to his motive for locking himself up all day, with all the shutters of his chamber closed, and also as to his reasons for seldom venturing out except at night. The doubt was too distressing for her female bosom, and she sedulously dequence of an insufficiency of evidence, and some adroit manouvering on the part of hole, until a lucky misplacement of the key between them. She then made an appointment to see him on the following day large amount of money was to be transulted that afternoon, and, accordingly, ac-

and, bursting with her secret, she hurried | to the master of the house, and informed him that the strange man was counting over lots of gold, and that the whole bed was covered with bank notes. Suspecting at once that this was the identical robber of the City Bank, the landlord hurried to the police office. He of course naturally inquired for Old Hays, that remarkable officer, whose fame was then co-equal to that of the police itself. Hays at once knew from the description of the man it must be Smith, and taking Homan, another officer with him, set out with the land-lord for the place. To their disappoint-ment they found the robber gone. The servant, in attempting to renew her investigations, had alarmed him, and he had left the house with the intention of seeking for a new location. His trunks, however, were fortunately unremoved, and upon an examination of them, a large portion of the money of the City Bank was found to make up the bulk of their contents. Having this guarantee for the return of the depredator, the officers waited calmly for his re-appearance. At the grey of evening, Smith came in, and upon being told a gentleman wished to see him, turned to meet the penetrating glance of the High Constable. The victim of his gaze turned pale, trembled, and suddenly fell back with a presentiment of danger. It was too late, for in the next instant he shrunk beneath the inflexible grasp of both the servants of the law. In due time he was tried, convicted, and sentenced to the State Prison for five years; the utmost penalty of the

Murray, alarmed at this, shaped his course for Philadelphia, where he was at length arrested, sent on here, and finally sentenced for the same term as Smith. He subsequently died in the State Prison, after serving out two years of his term.

After the conviction of her husband, the disconsolate Mrs. Smith removed back to the corner of Rosevelt and Madison streets, and solaced herself in the attachment of a young Englishman, whom she made her bar-keeper, and who was entitled to this preference and distinction from the fact of a previous acquaintance on the other side of the water.

Several months had now elapsed since the conviction of Smith and Murray; and Parkinson, who was living unsuspected with his booty, had already smashed or changed a large portion of the money. Feeling perfectly safe, now that the affair had ceased to excite the active attention of the police, he took a considerable sum of the Rutland Bank bills to Wall street for the purpose of converting them into other cash. As his unlucky stars would have it, he went into the office of the Messrs. Allen, the very owners of the special deposit, of which the notes he had with him were a part. The first one offered was recognized at once, and the unlucky rogue taken into custody. The business was then placed in the hands of Benjamin Hays, long known as one of our most efficient officers. and he, in the course of its diligent prosecution, made a complete search of Parkinson's house. This resulted in no direct success-so far as the business in hand was concerned-but there was found upon the premises a gold watch, of which Mr. Slamm, the father of the present Levi D. Slamm, had been robbed some time before upon the highway, and for which offence a man had a few days before been sentenced to the State Prison.

This sufficiently implicated Parkinson as a thief, and not being able to account satisfactorily for the possession of the Rutland money, he was fully committed for trial. While in prison, however, he managed to effect a compromise with the prosecution, and upon condition of delivering up $16,000, he was released. The Rutland money was then found, by his direction, to be concealed in the bottom of a common jack-plane which laid carelessly upon his work-bench, and which the officers in examination of his premises had several times had in their hands, and the unfortunate Spaniard's doubloons lay secreted in the false bottom of his tool chest.

Smith served his time out, and at the expiration of his term, returned to this city to see his wife, but to his surprise and discomfiture, he found her in possession of the man who was acting as the ostensible barkeeper, or rather master, of the crib. Expecting his visit, she had made up her mind to act decidedly, and plainly told him took place, and on condition of his releasing all claims upon her, she gave him a suit of clothes, and counted out to him a handsome sum of money. With this new start in the world, and with a heavy heart at this desertion by his partner of life, Smith went to Massachusetts. His wife shortly afterward sold out her establishment, and, with her man of business, retired to the western part of this State, where they have ever since lived as man and wife, and where he has managed to achieve a high official station, in which he has long acquitted himself with honor and credit. It is for this reason that we forbear mentioning his name.

In Boston, Smith immediately returned to his old pursuits, and by the natural freemasonry of crime, formed connections with, and drew around him the principal rogues of that city. For a time he was extremely successful in his nefarious pursuits, but at length, in an unlucky hour, being detected in the very act of frisking a dummy, or stealing a pocket-book, in a crowd, he was cut short in his career, and sent to the Massachusetts State Prison for three years.

This second lesson over, Smith came out and returned to this city. He was destitute, but he had talents and a character, and ran no risk of starving while an old associate lived who knew his worth. He fell accidentally upon Miller, better known to our old officers as "Cupid," an accomplished and notorious pickpocket, who at once took him to his bosom as a deserving confederate, and introduced him to the other pals who were then in daily communication with him. Miller, moreover, made him his partner in a pretended gold-beating establishment, and introduced him to his old pal Parkinson, who, meantime, had been residing in New Jersey, in very handsome style. Here was a connection that could not fail to be productive of vast results. Knowing all the "crossmen" of the country, and possessing a high reputation among their fellows, they may be regarded as having been the source and mainspring of the numerous felonies which have from time to time disturbed our community, and baffled our officers. The proceeds of their various depredations during the last three years, has enabled them all to live in affluence, and to amass a fund intended to operate as the common resource and sheet-anchor of either, or of all, in case of detection-a resource which, by the way, saved Monsieur Cupid about a year ago, by purchasing straw bail for him to the amount of $3,000 in a case of grand lar-

Smith, out of the proceeds of his dividends from this co-partnership, hired a handsome cottage in 51st street, between the Bloomingdale road and the Eighth avenue, about a year ago, (where he lived, with his daughter, under the name of Ed-wards,) and which, furnished in splendid style, served also as the residence of "Cu-pid," and the tête du pont, or head-quarters of the gang, for immediate operations. Parkinson had purchased himself a beautiful farm of one hundred and fourteen acres at Woodbridge, New Jersey, with a fine mansion upon it filled with the most sumptuous furniture, which answered as a safe retreat during the first bustle of inquiry; and the three together have more recently occupied the shop at No. 118 William street, as carvers and gilders, under the firm of Honeyman & Miller. Thus it will be seen, that their plans were admira-bly arranged, and their pursuits most effectually masked.

Being wholly and untiringly devoted to felonious enterprises, these confederates were continually engaged in devising plans and ferreting out means of plunder; and Parkinson, in the course of his individual peregrinations and investigations, found out that large amounts of money were frequently transmitted on board the barge Clinton, running between this city and Poughkeepsie. For the purpose of ac-quainting himself thoroughly with all the particulars of the circumstance, and of learning the habits of the hands on board, he made several trips up and down the river on various pretexts, and by his ap-pearance and representations, impressed all on board with the belief that he was a business man. At the conclusion of these excursions, he would hasten to his accomplices and consult over the facts which he had picked up.

At length these indefatigable efforts bore a prospect of reward, for Parkinson had learned, while on board of the barge on a quainted his accomplices with the fact. Smith, Cupid, and Davis, alias Dick Collard, and perhaps others, for all the partilard, and perhaps others, for all the particutars have not yet developed themselves, then proceeded to the barge for the purpose of watching their opportunity to obtain possession of the property. The coveted amount was a sum of $34,000, mostly in bills on the Poughkeepsie Bank, and it was deposited in a safe in the Captain's At twenty minutes before five o'clock, the Captain of the barge locked his safe, and afterwards his office, and left the boat for a few moments. Seizing this fortunate opportunity, a guard was set against interruption of the actual workmen in the business, and one of the party (Dick Collard, doubtless,) aided by a false key, entered the office, and, with another, opened the safe, obtained possession of the prize, and then suddenly decamped. For months no clue could be gained calculated to throw light upon the perpetrators of the deed, and the rogues rejoiced safely in the proceeds of their villany. Smith, Cupid, and the party to which they belonged, were suspected, but it was judged imprudent to arrest them and put them on their guard before some substantial evidences were obtained.

In the month of July last a letter was received at the Police, stating that a $20 note of the Poughkeepsie Bank had been exchanged in Rahway, N. J. Shortly after, Justice Taylor, who had taken the business actively in hand, discovered that another note of the same amount had been passed at the Jersey City Ferry. Three or four more followed at the same place, and were at length found to come from Parkinson. He was then closely watched for several weeks, and from his habit of sailing now and then in the steamboat plying between this city and New Bruns-wick, his residence at Woodbridge was discovered. Though proof enough was already had against him, great caution was necessary in his arrest, as none of his accomplices were yet found, and it was feared his apprehension on this latter charge would put them all on their guard. A fortunate circumstance, entirely un-connected with the robbery, occurred to lend its assistance to the business. A gentleman who was building a cottage in Brooklyn, became surprised at the disappearance of a servant girl whom he had brought with him from England, and unable to account for it he made inquiries about in different directions, and among other things, bethought him of applying to his master-carpenter, with whom he had seen her conversing a few days before. The builder assured him he knew nothing of her, but told him he would give him a let-ter to a person whom he thought could tell him where she was, and, accordingly, directed a letter to Parkinson. The gentleman called on Parkinson at his shop in William street, and from his position when the latter opened the letter, saw that it was directed on the inside to "Mr. Edwards" (Smith's alias.) On his re-marking "Your name is not Edwards?" Parkinson replied, "No, but the writer is a very familiar friend of mine, and addresses me thus through fancy." The gentleman, suspecting something, then made known the facts to Justice Taylor, who at once saw in them an opportunity to accomplish his objects. He now directed Parkinson's arrest. This was effected on his arrival from New Jersey in the Raribis present dress, and his general appeartan, and he was conveyed in a cab to the Upper Police. There the true cause of his arrest was carefully concealed, and he was only charged with the offence of the abduction of the girl, and the letter of the carpenter found upon his person was evidence against him. Parkinson protested for a length of time his entire innocence in the matter, but being pressed closer and closer, at length admitted the girl was at Smith's house, which he described to be in 51st street, as before mentioned. This information having been thus adroitly wound from him, he was informed of the true nature of the charge against him, and went to his cell consumed with mortification and despair at having been thus overreached to his own destruction.

The officers who arrested Parkinson were then dispatched to Smith's. They arrived at his house at the fashionable dinner hour, and found mine host regaling himself, in company with the veritable Cupid and Monsieur Davis, in the delicacy of dessert. The party, after protesting against this rough invasion of their rights, resorted to resistance, and Smith's daughter (a woman between 23 and 25 years of age) lent them a hand by striking at one of kinds of valuable property.

being followed immediately by Westerfield, was pursued to an upper chamber and detected in an attempt to hide some-thing between the beds, which proved to be a roll of the Poughkeepsie money, of which an amount of $300, in all, was found upon him. Miller, or "Cupid," made a most determined resistance, but was finally ironed, and, with the other two, conveyed to their present location, the Tombs. It is proper to mention here that the servant girl who had so mysteriously disappeared, was found at Smith's house, apparently very well content with Parkinson's house at Woodbridge was next searched, and a sum of $226 of the stolen money secured. $200 of this amount consisted of bills of the Rahway Bank, which Mrs. Parkinson .confessed having obtained from that institution herself in change for three Poughkeepsie notes, viz: one $100 and two $50's. These were, of course, returned to the bank and the original notes obtained.

The shop in William street was the next sulject of investigation, and after a thorough search a sum of $2,300 was found secreted between a second story window and the outside blind, among a lot of old glass and tin. For this there is no claimant, as all the parties wisely deny all knowledge of it. Thus far, therefore, $2,826 have been secured, and it is not improbable that the great bulk of the whole depredation may come back to compromise the depredators out of the dangerous clutches of the law. Three at-tempts have already been made for their release in the way of bail, both of which, however, have signally failed. The public will not in their case however tolerate the rule which allows the offender's "gilded hand to buy out the law" at the mere price of a "straw." They have, therefore, no hope short of the heavier disgorgement of a compromise. Parkinson, who once so successfully escaped in this way, and who appears to be actuated by a very sincere desire to enjoy the luxuries of his magnificent country residence again, may perhaps be induced to save himself in this case by turning State's evidence. The chances of this result are materially enhanced by the fact that he has already sta-ted that his three accomplices are "the right men." We have therefore before us the probable spectacle of another instance of the meanest villain of the crew escaping by betraying the associates whose crimes and whose plunder he has shared.

OWNERS OF WATCHES .- All owners of valuable watches should make it a point, immediately upon their purchase, to transcribe their number and the maker's name upon some private memorandum, so that upon their loss by theft or inadvertence, they may furnish a description which may lead to the detection of the thief or the recovery by other means. This rule would be a wise precaution, if applied to all other

THE INVISIBLE PURSUER .- A case occurred in England not long ago, which deof the recent Salt-Hill murder did the efficacy of the magnetic telegraph. A murder of almost unexampled atrocky had been committed in the vicinity of London, upon a woman and her two children, and no clue could be obtained of the perpetrator of the deed. Public horror was at its height, and every degree of human ingenuity and effort was put in requisition to solve the hideous mystery. At length a clue was got, and a day laborer, who lived in a house adjoining the deceased, and who had absconded a few days after the commission of the crime, was suspected. The London Police Gazette immediately obtained a description of his person, and sent it in the columns of its numerous issue to every part of the United Kingdom and the Colonies. Three days after this publication, and ten after the murder, an which was the most discourage aged magistrate of the county of Ireland, sat before his door at the of day, and commenced the period papers which the last mail had from London. He came to the Gazette, and noticed the account of London murder. Shuddaring with a ral horror at its strocity, he ra-rescription of the suspected person, thus engaged, a shadow glanced a sheet, caused by the figure of a m ing between him and the aup. He his eyes carelessly, as one will in a casual interruption, but was addicate alyzed by the appearance of the fore him. It appeared as if the of his imagination had been suddenly jured into life, and had slipped fro columns of the journal to glare upon him as a bideous reality. In the next so alarmed at the old man's stare, slipped away. It was too late the si spirit of the press had performed its office. The alarm was given, the fugitive overtaken, and, bound with cords, the follow ing day saw him on his way to the capital, to fulfil upon the scaffold the murderer's doom.

MOCK MERCHANTS, OR FALSE PRETEN-DERS .- The number, the ability, the profound combination, and the address of this class of swindlers, has long been the fruitful complaint of honest dealers, and of the frequent animadversions of the city press. Still, they go on increasing from year to year, and scarcely a decade of the calendar goes by unmarked by some enormous frand which speaks the history of their progress. The natural guards against this are the prompt and decisive action of the law, the fearless and unflinching exposure of the press, and the caution and discrimination of the merchant himself. From the imbecility and laxity of the first of these means, we have but little to expect; the second, trammeled and brow-beaten by vexatious and illiberal restrictions, is cramped of half its force; and, abandoned to his foes, the honest dealer is thrown back for his whole reliance on the third. As far as any press may, however, we are determined to make war upon these genii, and mete out to them the same measure of exposure that stamps the infamy of the less accomplished felon; and we shall expect, in our endeavors, such assistance from those whose cause is served, as shall help to sustain us in the task.

This class of swindlers, though composed of the natives of all countries, is an example of a most harmonious incongruity. Each seconds the other in his practices upon a fair dealer, with all the ardor and energy that could be inspired by the worthiest cause or the liveliest interest; and whether or no they effect a personal gain by their exertions, they regard his victimization as a special triumph. This does monstrated the value of a Police Gazette, not proceed exactly from the substantive as completely as the detection in the case villany of the heart, but from a sort of infatuati n or passion which imbues the minds of all who gamble with danger, and stake their hopes upon continual and fourful risks. Crime of all kinds inflicts its heaviest penalty in an irretrievable debasement of the sentiments and principles.

Neither the design of the present article nor our space will permit us now to enter far into the ramifications of their mercantile witchcraft and diablerie. A single example, therefore, for the present, must suffice.

One of their most distinguished members-a German, and a man of most remarkable ability-was one day sauntering down Pearl street, penniless and dispirited His operations had for a long time been unfortunate, and he had, on several oc sions, in the few preceding days, given himself up to profound refle of Albany Basin, or the unfathomable thus the deluded dealer runs the fatal then generally making it a rule to save depths of his own pocket. He paused before a large warehouse, and the contempla- ed and the goods obtained from him with a of a ticket; but when the legislature of tion of its ample store of goods inspired a regular bill of sale by Messrs. Weiderman re-action. His energies began to stir with- & Co. in him, and, in the desperation of the moment, his old enterprize revived.

"How much do you ask a gross for dese brogans?" inquire he of the first clerk, as he bustled into the store.

"$162," was the answer.

"I want three gross; can't you make dem less ?"

" Well, we'll say $160."

"Ah, dat will do. Well, sir, what are your terms?"

" Cash."

"Ah, I prefer four months. For desc articles we get such long returns, and money is now so very scarce."

"What is the name of your house, sir?" "Weiderman & Co. We can furnish you with reference in abundance and you can satisfy yourselves very readily of the sufficiency of the firm." Mr. Weiderman & Co. then gives the names of four or five congenial mercantile Funks, and urges the dealer to attend to the matter at once, as he wishes the articles on the morrow. He then flies to the stores of each of the confe ates to whom he has referred (and for whom he is ready to do the same favor whenever required,) describes the personal appearance of the dealer and his clerks, and bids all hands to look business-like when any of them appears.

By and by the dealer makes his appearance and all the loungers of the establishment fly to their pens. The ledger, the cash book, the day book, are successively taken down and put up by one another, while a distracted clerk starts from his desk, smacks a pen crosswise in his jaws, and bustles to a distant shelf to lose himself in a bundle of accounts.

" Is either of the firm of Rouge & Noir in sir?" inquires the merchant, approaching the desk.

"Yes sir, I am the senior of that firm," replies the gentleman addressed, with a short business nod. "Wait a moment if you please, sir. Charles, take this check to the Merchants' bank and get me four 100's and the rest in 10's! Quick now, for I want to go out as soon as you return. Now sir, I am at your service."

"Sir, I called to make some inquiries as to the firm of Weiderman & Co."

"Ah, yes, sir; sit down, sir; sit down!"

"Do you know them, sir?"

" Oh yes, very well, we have had dealings with them, sir."

" Are they good !"

"Why: sir, you see, these are very uncertain times, and a man who is good today, may not be good to-morrow. One can't tell who to trust or who to recommend. In this case however-William! the ledger and see how much we have credited Weiderman & Co. In this case, however, sir, I think you might safely-How much did you say, William ?"

"In this case, however, sir, I think you might trust them for-but how much is the amount of your bill, sir ?"

" $450."

"Oh for such an amount as that, they are always good! Henry, run down to Baudoine's & Roule'te's and tell them to get out those 14 pipes. Madeira and have them ready for transcripment at once. Good morning, sir."

At the next place, while making inquiries, a clerk bursts in with a fist full of spurious bank notes, which he ostentationsly counts down as the first instalment of | Previous to 1832, this system of insur-

There is scarcely a day unmarked by such a depredation as the above, and yet the system is carried on in despite of the law, and in safe defiance of its power. The bill of sale legalizes the transfer of the property, and of the false representations of the swindler's confederates, the dealer has no testimony but his own. We shall turn to this subject frequently. In the mean these classes who became most distintime we should feel obliged to any merchant for authentic information concerning any of the class.

LOTTERY POLICY GAMBLING .- The recent robbery of Tiffany, Young & Ellis, of Broadway, by their colored porter, has presented another example of the thousand already in existence, of the ruinous effects of policy gambling, not only on the pecuniary condition of its infatuated victims, but upon their moral character.

Policy gambling is a system which was invented by petty dealers to accommodate the passions of the poor, and to afford them the luxury of taking a pinch of indulgence admeasured to the extent of their capital, and their capacity to be ruined. The game is founded on the regular drawings made in other states, and the vender is himself the banker. For instance, out of 60 numbers put into the wheel, ten are to be drawn forth: out of 75 twelve, and so on according to the variations of the "scheme."

The poor, who out of their meagre earnings, cannot afford to purchase an expensive ticket, go to a dealer, and bet him one shilling, or one dollar, (for the scale can be enlarged or reduced at pleasure,) against five, that number 6, or any other specified, will be among those drawn. The banker takes the offer, notes it in his book, and gives the player a memorandum of the bet upon a slip of paper, until the decision of the wager by the drawing of the lottery. These bits of paper are what are called " policies." We will give one of these taken from the person of John Holmes as a spe-

If the chosen number comes out and the dealer is "hit," he loses but four shillings, having previously received one for the risk-while it is six chances to one against the player. If more sanguine in his character, the player wishes to take a more desperate risk, in the hope of a heavier return, he bets his shilling, or his dollar, that number 6 will not only be among those drawn, but it will be the third, or fourth, or last one out of the wheel. By this arrangement it will be perceived that the risk is enhanced immensely, and the banker accordingly, if "hit," promises a return of 60 for 1. These latter are called "station numbers," because their station in the slip is indicated, and the former ones are called " day numbers," because it is sufficient for the player if they be out anywhere on the day's drawing. More recent efforts of genius in the science of policies have invented "horses," "gigs," "whips" and "saddles," but those being fancy combinations, requiring an elaborate description, they would only occupy unnecessary space, and moreover are not requisite to our present pur-

Men of extensive capital, who had formerly been heavy dealers in the ticket traffic. adventured into this new speculation, and others, guarantied by the immense per centages, commenced, upon a visionary basis. Among the former and latter of guished in the trade, were Baker, Judah, Webber, Cole, and Petty. The rates were then fifteen cents for a station number of $5, which allowed a profit of 57 per cent. The immense profits of this business and the rapid fortunes the above dealers were making at it, aroused the cupidity of a horde of speculators, who rushed into the field. The result of this extensive competition was a reduction of the rates in 1838 of 39 to a shilling. At length, they were brought down to 8 pence, and the dealers' harvest consequently is now reaped at the rate of about 31 per cent.. Enticed by the facilities which this offered for the gratifications of their passion for gambling new players were won to the infatuation every day, and at the present time it embraces within its fatal influence, in addition to thousands of our poorer white population, almost every negro, whether male or female, in the city.

> The results of this are easy to be seen Its deluded and infatuated victims, unable to satisfy its exorbitant demands by their legitimate earnings, yield to its corrupting influence, and commence pilfering from their employers. Step by step they wade deeper and deeper into crime, until advancing beyond the limit of precaution they are engulphed in ruin.

The miserable victim is then consigned to the horror of a cell, and subsequently to a convict's doom, while those who are chargeable with his guilt, those who suborned him by their devilish traffic into crime, curse him for a "d-d black rascal," and riot in the avails of his plunder. We do not hesitate to say, and we believe facts will bear us out in the assertion, that nine-tenths of the crime and prostitution of the colored classes of the city are produced either directly or indirectly by policy gambling. Examine our prisons, and see if the history of their inmates will not attest the fact.

Is this then any longer to be endured? Are the authorities of our city any longer to foster these jackals, by tolerating their nefarious practices? Is the statute to be defied and the law mocked, by a horde of villains who cluster like flies in every street where poverty has shrunk to its abode, and where gasping labor can be extorted of its pittance in the vain hope of casting a goldanchor in the future? What la good Messieurs of the sword and scales? Cannot even-handed Justice, who bestows her slashing strokes so liberally upon the impoverished and friendless victim, make one of her six cuts over the costards of this contemptible banditti. Do we live under laws, or is ruin and defiance licensed to grin from the bow windows of five thousand densof plunder without rebuke, while a force of eight hundred men loaf by turns on grocers' barrels, or hang about hydrants to pass soft compliments to errand servant maids, or waste their tremendous energies upon the apprehension of wandering drunkards? Is there no one man in the country, in remembrance of his oath, bold enough to step into these nurseries of crime and cry "Forbear to violate the law!" Why do not Grand Juries act without delay?

INTERESTING TRIALS .- The Court of General Sessions commenced its term on Monday last. It is probable that Schermerhorn, Ashley, and Higgins, will be tried for forgery, during the term, and Coulter, Bartlett & Co., for their extensive false pretence operations. Also, Madame Costello, for abortion, and Smith, Davis, and Cupid, for the robbery of the Poughkeepsie barge. The trials of each of these parties will be fully reported in our columns, and extras published each afternoon, when public interest demands the expense.

House THIEVES .- There is no class of thieves more numerous than these, and certainly none which more safely and successfully practice depredations. In guarding against them, house keepers would do well to look after their servant girls. Their most common method of obtaining the secrets of the establishment, is by ingratiating themselves with the females of the kitchen, and through their unwary gabble to learn every particular worthy of their knowledge. The unsuspicious girl, flattered by the attention paid to her, is frequently induced to admit the designing wooer surreptitiously at a late hour, and after a robbery is committed, and he comes again, she tells him the story of the loss with wondering eyes, and perhaps cautions him against breathing to a soul that she left the door unbolted for his admission. If she suspects him she keeps it secret, in safety to her own character. This is the simple explanation of the cause of the number of these kind of robberies, and if citizens, while they were wondering at the facts had directed their attention a little more to causes, a deal of mischief might have been prevented and their blind amazement reduced to rational philosophy. Let them therefore look to the kitchen, as well as the front entrance, and the main passages, and our word for it their risks will lessen and their losses decrease.

PANEL THIEVES .- Of late the public have been troubled very little about these rogues. This is not because they have decreased in number or fallen off in their depredations, but because experience has taught certain police officers, that heretofore they have sacrificed their interests to too persevering a prosecution of some of the industrii of the above class. They have lost two or three thousand dollars a year by the incarceration of "French Jack" in the Washington prison. Aleck Hoag's confinement at Sing Sing takes off nearly double that amount, and the transfer of Jack Cherry to Philadelphia and the profits of his business to the police of that city, has cut off another large source of income of those of our ex-officers who followed the panel "lay." They have remedied this, however, by a more discreet system of procedure, and instead of giving way to a foolish adherence to duty, they wisely compound the offence with the rogue on a division of the plunder, and spare themselves the trouble of an arrest and a subsequent attendance at the Grand Jury. Hence the few arrests of the rogues of this "lay." How far the officer is excusable for turning the plunder into his own pockets, which would otherwise only find its way into the hands of grasping Tombs lawyers or corrupt bail-masters, we leave the public to judge, but that the science of the officer consists in adroitly letting go, instead of taking in, there can be no shadow of doubt. The

This is a subject, which, like many others that are beyond the reach of palsied authority, must be taken up by us, and we hereby request any victim who may be plundered by the infamous system of these badgers, to give their information to us, and consign the vagabonds who have robbed them to a deserved exposure. This is the only means of redress which society has left. Since the adoption of the system of straw bail, and its direction and adaptation by unscrupulous pettifoggers, rogues laugh at and despise the powers of the law, while they dread alone the penetrating search and untiring pursuit of the press. From this they must not be suffered to escape, whatever other punishment they may evade.

BOB SUTTON AGAIN IN QUOD .- The notorious burglar, Bob Sutton, was arrested on the 25th ult., at his lodgings in Madison street, on a warrant issued by Mayor Havemeyer, for threats of personal violence made against Enoch E. Camp, one of the editors of this Gazette, in his absence. We hope this evidence will answer for the whole fraternity of felonious banditti. Neither threats nor favors will deter us from our course, as they will perceive by the perusal of this day's number. We set the whole felonious gang at defiance, and shall follow them continually, so long as they infest our city.

And generally all Diseases affecting the Organs and not only is it the most powerful agent known in removina all diseases and obstructions of the respiratory organs, but in scrouious maladies it has been found equally efficient, having been employed with astonishing success in the radical cure of King's Evil, Eruptions of the skin, Ulcerations, and the like complaints caused by impurity of the blood. In Dyspepaia and Liver complaints it has proved a certain remedy. This Syrup, skhough powerfully curative in its results, is yet midd in its action, and may be afely employed in the most delicate cases. It is agreeable to the taste and to the stomach, and in diseases of women and children the most extraordinary cures have been effected.

and to the stomach, and in diseases of women and children the most extraordinary cures have been effected.

The operation of this Syrup is both General and Special. While it acts generally upon the whole system as a most powerful alternative, purifying the fluids, freelog the solids from all morbid secretions, and reinvigorating and bringing up all the vital energies to the standard of permanent health, it at the same tume exerts a specific influence upon the lungs, bronchist tubes, windpipe and throat, and ly mphatic and glandular systems, exciting them to healthful activity, removing all morbid matter, equalizing the circulation, restoring the proper and necessary secretions, and finally accomplishing a complete renovation from disease, and restoration to sound and permanent health.

Those who have been racked by the prostrating fevers, and lung, as well as pleuritic and dyspeptic affections of the West and South; those who have been brought down by the inflammatory, febrile, or chronic diseases more common to the East and North; those whose constitutions have become enfeebled by the use of mercury, quinine, or other violent remedies, or by intemperate inabits, should lose no time in betaking themselves to an adequate restoraive. The Consumptive Preusposition, in its various and deceiful forms, its already, in a greater or less degree, acquired. The fatal taint will descend to unfortunate offspring. And if no sufficient remedial course be adopted and persevered in, parents first and children afterwards, sink into early or premature graves—victima alike to the same wasting, deadly malady.

These lamentable results could and should be preveted. It has been well remarked that health is cheep at any price. Besides the strongest motives of self-preservation, the strongest ties of parental responsibility and love demand that these pernicious constitutional tendencies be promptly met, thoroughly combated, and if possible, finally eradicated. It most cases; it can be done. My confidence is based upon the solid ground morral sickness, give place to a gradual restoration to ultimate arrength and health.

BEEKMAN'S PULMONIC SYRUP is the safest, surest and best remedy that can be employed to accomplish these most desirable and important ends. It has grown rapidly and necessarily into extensive use. Its operation is so imild that the tenderest infant may take it, and yet so powerful as to overcome, completely, the most inveterate of maladies. Travelling with the circulation, it pours its healing current through every vein and artery of the human body. The whole animal economy is made to undergo a thorough radical change.—Even the mint partakes of the heartiful process, and life, that before appeared one dreary waste, begins again to seem worth possessing.

This gratifying result, however, ought not to be looked for in any case, where optism, laudanum, or alcoholic stimulants are indulged in. These may, as reason and experience have abundantly taught, sooner or later, according to the frequency and extent of their use, utterly subvert the whole being, and oppose the vitai movements of my Remedy. They should therefore be abandoned, or no remedial course which skill may advise or philanthropy commend can prove of avail. Tobacco, too, as a general rule, is huriful; but for the consumptive, or consumptively inclined, to prolong its use, must prove highly prejudicial;—while the dyspeptic, in seeking a momentary relief in the narcolic stimulus, only increases the intensity and complexity of his symptoms, and precipitates a fatal result to the disease, from the ravages of which the latter part of his existence has been only a protraction of agony and gloom.

As 1 have elsewhere suggested, my Remedy is composed, exclouively, of certain essential principles derived from the vegetable kingdom; the varied and remarkable productions of which require, in order to secure, invariably, their most valuable properties, that certain conditions be scruptulously observed; and that during the same periods, their medicinal effects upon the animal econo during the same periods, their menional encounters the animal economy darry, and frequently become completely changed.

Nor is it the knowledge of what a medicine is compounded merely, but the exercise of great skill and judgment in the preparation which renders that medicine genuine and effective. Ignorance, carelessness, or an undue attempt to make a medicine cheap, must, of necessity, be destructive of its best medical virtues. I alone have the aid of a discovery, and the application of an improved and only suitable apparatus, by means of which my Syrup is rendered free from all impurities, and its full and uniform strength insured, without the use of that kind of heat which tends to destroy the medical properties of some of the most effective ingredients.

Many eminent physicians, being convinced that my

Many eminent physicians, being convinced that my Syrup is compounded upon the moust scientific principles of Chemical Analysis, as applied to Materia Medica, are now employing and recommending it in their practice. In truth, human experiment and investigation never produced so happy a combination as the Original Genuine Pulmonte Byrup. It stands alone upon the imperiabable rock of a wide and successful experience. The most requested in its behalf is a fair trial, and a careful compliance with the directions accompanying each bottle.

REEKMAN'S SYRUP is now kept constantly on hand by many families of the highest respectability, as being one of the most soothing, effective, and useful medicines ever discovered. Every family, both in the city and country, as well as persons travelling, should always have it, that it may be immediately resorted to in cases of sudden atacks of cold, or an appearance of any of those more trying and dangerous complaints in which, by its remarkable powers, it has proved so sure a remedy and so great a blessing.

My advice to numerous patients, or their friends, who have called at my office, as well as to others whom I have visited, both in the city and country, and the gradually increasing, and now wide-spread popularity, of my treatment of consumption, colds, coughs, diseases of the organs of respiration, generally, as well the liver complaint and dyspepsia, have caused great numbers to make application to me, most of whom, I am gratified to state, I have been the means of benefiting and restoring to health.

No other Syrup is, nor can justly claim to be equal to, or like mine.

I wish those who feel an interest in the subject, and especially those who wish to obtain the medicine,

ACCOR

Of a Daily Paper, to be issued on the first of October 1845, under the title of

THE NEW-ORLEANS COMMERCIAL TIMES.

Commerce, Agriculture, Literature, and the Arts.

Commerce, Agriculture, Literature, and the Arts.

The undersigned propose publishing on the let day of October next, a Daily Paper, under the above title. The rapidly increasing importance of the city of New Orleans, which seems destined at no remote period to occupy the most prominent position on this continent as a Commercial Emporium, has led the publishers to believe, that an organ specially devoted to the cause of the Mercantile and Agricultural classes, will meet that fostering support and encouragement, which this community has at all times so liberally setended to enterprise, having for its object the advancement and prosperity of these important interests.

Discarding all political controversy, it is the intention of the undersigned to impart to their journal a character thoroughly commercial. To this end, the most ample and detailed reports of the daily operations in the market, with a careful review of the measury transactions, will be given; in short, all information which may be useful to the man of business, will be embodied in their columns. Every effort will be used to render this department accurate and complete.—Arrangements are in progress, for a regular and efficient correspondence with writers of acknowledged ability, in Europe, and in the Northern and Western cities, which will enable the undersigned to present to their readers an epitome of events in those quarters, more interesting than can be gleaned from other sources. The reports of transactions in this market, will be under the management of Mr. L. Havliegen, who for many years past has been associated with some of the leading journals of this city, as their Commercial Editor.

Looking to the immense and rapidly extending value of the Agricultural interests of the South-west, it will be the constant aim of the Editors to place before their readers all such information as may tend to the improvement of those prominent staples which constitutions. Literature and the Fins Arts will also have their place, and be advocated with the seal t paper.

D. A semi-weekly country edition, will be land on Wednesday and Saturday, containing a comple price current, and review of the market, together will all the reading matter comprised in the daily paper, Price, 35 per annum.

Pledging their best energies to the accomplishment of the undertaking, the undersigned respectfully allcit the patronage of the Public.

PROSPECTUS.

THE NATIONAL POLICE GAZETTE.—It is the stention of the Publishers of this sheet to isweekly, and should circumstances warrant it, oftener, a newspaper under the above title, devoted to the interests of criminal police. The necessity of such an instrument to assist the operations of the department, and to perform that species of service which does not lie withthat species of service which does not lie within the scope of the present system, will make itself apparent at a glance. Our city, and indeed the whole country, swarms with hordes of English and other thieves, burglars, pickpockets, and swindlers, whose daily and nightyexploits give continual employment to our officers, and whose course through the land, whatever direction they may take, may be traced by their depredations. These offenders, though known to our most experienced members of the police, are entirely protected from though anown to our most experience members of the police, are entirely protected from the corutiny of the community at large; and the natural result is, that the unconscious public are in continual contact with miscreants who date their last stationary residence from the walls of Newgate, the shores of Botany Bay, or who have but recently left the confines of our own State Prison.

It is of the first importance that these vaga-bonds should be notoriously known. The success of the felon depends mainly upon the ignorance of the community as to his charac-ter, and until a system be adopted which will effectually hold him up to public shame and ir-revocable exposure, the public will still remain at the mercy of his depredations, and nine-tenths of his fraternity go scot-free of any Suffering under the continually increasing evils which the immunity thus enjoyed by large classes of offenders has encouraged, plan after classes of offenders has encouraged, plan after plan has been devised, and system after system to reform and remedy, projected. The throes of years, and the undiscouraged travail of a thousand brains, instead of resulting in the adoption of new, bold, and original measures, has merely eventuated in the remodelling of a department. The press—the mightiest conservator of social welfare—has been left from the category of appliances, while every from the category of appliances, while every other branch of civil polity feels the force of its protective surveillance.

In France, and the other nations of continental Europe, gigantic and penetrating sys-tems of police, the regulation of passports, and the continual surveillance of a numerous and the continual surveillance of a numerous and energetic gens d'armes, have obviated the necessity of special departmental journals; but in England, where a more liberal system of civil regulation rejects such checks upon the freedom of the subject, the Government finds it politic, nay necessary, for the performance of such services as are beyond the accomplishment of mere physical energy, to maintain an organ of their own. The results of this line of policy may be seen in the extensively beneficial influences which their "Police Gazette" exercises throughout their realm, and which it exercises throughout their realm, and which it extends unto this side of the Atlantic.

fore, be to supply the deficient arm of our criminal police by an organ which will communicate familiarly with the public upon all the statistics of the department, whether secret or otherwise, and which will make them conversant with the modes and means in continual sant with the modes and means in continual operation against the safety of their property. The success of felons depends mainly, as we said before, upon the public ignorance of their persons and pursuits. It will be our object, therefore, to strip them of the advantages of a professional incognito, by publishing a minute description of their names, aliases, and persons; a success this to you of their prayious career, their a succinct histery of their previous career, their place of residence at the time of writing, and a current account of their movements from time current account of their movements from time to time. By this means, the most dangerous offenders, the knowledge of whose infamy has slept for years in the bosoms of a few tenacious officers, will be spotted from one end of the Union to the other, and every community throughout its length and breadth be put upon its guard against them. The peculiar stock in trade of the officers will be made the common property of the public; and the felon, branded with his shame, will be pointed out on all sides, and be stripped of the social impunity which mainly emboldened him to offence. The result of an active adoption of this course must therefore necessarily be to drive all resident rogues to a more safe and congenial meridian, and to deter all floating tribes of vagabond adventurers from embarking to a region where an untiring and ubiquitous minister of public justice stands ready to hold them to the public area until they become powerless from the necessary. gaze until they become powerless from the no-toriety of their debasement.

To render the design of the proprietors generally serviceable to the whole country, it is their intention to open a correspondence with the principal cities and towns of the United the principal cities and towns of the United States, and, as soon as their arrangements will permit, to extend it to the police departments of Paris and London, for the purpose of effecting a regular exchange of criminal intelligence.

In addition to this criminal way-bill and journal of export and import, weekly histories will be given, under the title of "Lives of the Frions." of notorious professional offenders.

Filons," of notorious professional offenders, which will comprise in its gallery of notorious more of the philosophy of character and a larger fund of startling and romantic incident than all other schools of biography and ingenious fiction combined.

The "National Police Gazette" will likewise be a vehicle, by its advertising columns, for the discovery of property lost, description of unclaimed goods taken from suspected persons, and for all the various objects connected either remotely or immediately with police afficient

To render the Gazette of absolute necessity to the whole business community, it will contain a full and accurate list of all new counter feits, fraudulent and altered bank notes

The advantages thus possessed by this jour-nal, will be at once apparent, as the knowledge of a new counterfeit is almost always arst obtained by the police of the various cities with whom the publishers of this paper will be in whom the publishers of this paper will deally correspondence.

Such are some of the features, and such some of the objects which have induced the proprietors of this journal to embark in their ent enterprise.

They therefore confidently rely upon the patronage of the public as the natural assistance for their undertaking, making them the promise, that if they do not fail in their part of the obli-gation, we shall not omit fulfilling ours.

FALL FASHIONS. BLOOMER'S FALL HATS

BLOOMER'S FALL HATS

Are now ready, and he invites attention to them, as being all that the greatest devotee of fashion could require. He does not pretend to give the dimensions of the brim, the curve, the height of the crown, or the width of the binding. Twenty-six years' experience has taught him that one shape Hat will not suit every form of face, and he has found none yet who are willing to sacrifice all appearances to fashion. His hats are made to suit the style of the heads, and while he yields to none in point of taste or style, he ventures to assert with perfect confidence that no one wearing his hats would be called out of fashion. He invites an inspection and trial of his hats, confident that in point of style, finish, material, and workmanship, they are equal to any in the city, while they are sold at the extremely low price of THREE BOLLARS, the price of other dealers being "four."

His assortment of Gentlemen's and Children's Caps, of the most beautiful style, is very large, and together with every article in the line, are offered at greatly reduced prices.
